Introduction: Ambiguity in Case Management-related Responsibilities****

1. When the physical therapy department calls to say that they cannot send a therapist to ambulate Mrs. Jones today because of sick calls, should nursing or case management fill in the void and walk the patient?
2. When the doctor says the patient cannot be discharged until the patient is cleared by the infectious disease consult and the cardiologist, who's responsibility is it to call those MDs?
3. When the child's family announces that they want their son to go to the rehab hospital that the doctor suggested, and the case manager knows that their insurance won't cover it, who's responsibility is it to discuss this with the family?
4. When the case manager notices that a patient hasn't received the hypertension medication ordered 8 hours ago, who should she tell?

These are only a few of the myriad of situations that arise every day for case managers and others as we try to move patients correctly toward clinical outcomes and the next level of care. Much of CCM's current consultation about case management and related functions has been about role clarification: "Who—nurses, case managers, social workers, doctors—should do what?" This confusion may be the result of poor model design, but it may also be the result of multiple priorities within extremely complex and pressured work environments. The main cause is certainly not due to everyone wanting everyone else's job! In CCM's experience, there has been significant slippage in the traditional roles and expectations of doctors, nurses, and social workers. In the past, there were usually enough of the same experienced people in the same roles day after day to provide the sense of order and stability. Professionals did not have to renegotiate their priorities and roles every day, every patient. Nowadays, this is the exception rather than the norm.

Guide for Role Clarification: Who Manages the Plans for the Day, the Pay, the Stay, and the Way?

Acknowledging that every situation is different, and that there should always be flexibility when it comes to patient care, CCM has developed the following role descriptions and differentiation chart that can be applied to most short and long term acute care organizations.

Plan for the DAY (the transaction level)... brought to you by the Staff RN working collaboratively. All caregivers make their plans for interactions with the patient, whether the intervention is a few minutes or over a period of an hour, a shift, a visit, or a day. These plans are driven by a combination of MD orders, patient needs, and time. The staff RN responsible for* the patient each shift, directly or through nurses' aides, is the point person for pulling together and assuring the daily plan, determining that all treatments, tests, and therapies are performed and sequenced to continue the patient's progress toward clinical outcomes. Clinical paths, secretaries, and others support this effort.

Plan for the Stay (Period from Crisis to Stabilization)...

brought to you by the Case Manager working with systems.

Case managers provide decision support to the direct caregivers and MDs, using information, synthesis, and creativity. They pace the team and the system to ensure that both margin and mission (clinical outcomes) are met within quality standards. They are responsible for integrating the Plan for the Day into the broader Plan for the Stay, and for arranging for safe and smooth transitions between levels of care.

Plan for the Pay (reimbursement for work)...brought to you by the Case Manager connecting the payer with the provider.

Case managers work closely with finance, business offices, MDs, coders, and others to ensure that the interventions of all professionals and departments will be and are reimbursed.

Plan for the Way (solutions and changes for recovery and health)...brought to you by health care specialists in their field.

The way extends beyond the stay. It includes professionals that provide a wide range of special assistance along each patient and family's personal continuum; ie. helping families make difficult decisions, helping patients make life-style changes, negotiating and procuring individualized plans of care and resources for that care, programs of prevention, and disease management.

There are at least two principles that should be considered when clarifying roles. First, nurses—whether case managers or clinical staff nurses— should not be resolving clinical questions or disagreements between physicians. Second, everyone should be able to help out as much as they are legally and skill-wise able when other staff are short, but as the saying goes: “a favor soon becomes an obligation”. If one person or department is rarely or inconsistently fulfilling their responsibilities, the problem should be brought to the attention of the larger group. If you are always in the position of helping out, you cannot get your own work accomplished.

To further clarify, The Center for Case Management also offers a basic table to adapt as you discuss implications of role clarification throughout a patient's admission. (See Figure 1)

Summary

The information here cannot directly answer the questions included in the opening four examples, but they can be used as a springboard for discussion and negotiation. One of the most useful and immediate actions is to have a series of brief meetings between the case managers, the nurse managers, the social workers, and any hospitalists or other MDs covering particular clinical areas to discuss what you can each do for the other, and how to stay patient-centered. You would be surprised at how many assumptions are made and how this simple intervention can help build bridges between departments.

Look what's been said about one of our recent programs:

The Center for Case Management has developed a module for case management staff development called “Working Together for Outcomes”. This excellent program was just presented to my staff as well as all the case managers in our 42-hospital organization. It includes a physician who works as an advisor as well as having an internal medicine practice. There are many excellent points included which can facilitate the team approach that we are all attempting to foster in acute care to move the patient through the continuum.
